Abstract. The stability and independence of a state are primarily determined by the loyalty, national pride, and civic responsibility of its citizens. Military-patriotic education plays a crucial role in shaping these qualities, preparing the younger generation to defend the Motherland, respect national values, and fulfill civic duties. This article examines the theoretical and practical foundations of military-patriotic education, its essential characteristics, and the social factors influencing its formation. Military patriotism is defined as a set of social and moral qualities, including devotion to the country, readiness to protect its independence and territorial integrity, and awareness of civic duty. The study highlights the importance of family, the education system, cultural and educational activities, and mass media in fostering military-patriotic consciousness among youth. It also emphasizes the continuity of military-patriotic education from preschool to higher education and the need for cooperation among social institutions. In contemporary society, cultivating military patriotism is essential for developing civic responsibility, national pride, and readiness to ensure state security. The findings underscore the importance of a comprehensive and continuous approach to nurturing patriotic values in the younger generation.

Keywords: Military-patriotic education, youth, civic responsibility, national pride, state security, socio-pedagogical factors.

The stability and independence of any state are determined прежде всего by the loyalty of its citizens to the Motherland, their national pride, and their sense of civic responsibility. From this perspective, the education of military patriotism is considered one of the important socio-pedagogical tasks of societal development. Military patriotism embodies such qualities as devotion to the Motherland, readiness to defend its interests, and respect for national values.

In today's conditions of globalization, fostering among young people a sense of national identity, responsibility for the development of the country, and readiness to ensure state security remains one of the urgent tasks. Therefore, studying the theoretical and practical foundations of military-patriotic education and organizing it effectively within the education system is of significant scientific importance. Military patriotism is a set of social and moral qualities that reflect a person's devotion to the Motherland, readiness to defend its independence and territorial integrity, and commitment to protecting national interests. This concept includes not only knowledge and skills related to military service but also high moral values. Military patriotism reflects the following aspects of an individual: love and devotion to the Motherland; national pride and respect for historical heritage; awareness of civic duty; readiness to ensure state security; social responsibility and collectivism. The development of these qualities in the consciousness of the younger generation contributes to the spiritual and political stability of society. Military-patriotic education differs from other types of education in its content, goals, and methods. Its main characteristics include:

1. Goal orientation – military-patriotic education aims to prepare the younger generation to defend the Motherland, to develop their awareness of civic duty, and to foster loyalty to national interests.
2. Complexity – this type of education requires the integration of spiritual, physical, moral, and social components. The formation of military patriotism is not limited to theoretical knowledge but is implemented through practical training, military-sports events, and educational activities.
3. Reliance on historical heritage – military-patriotic education is based on the historical experience of the people, the lives of national heroes, and military traditions. This contributes to the development of national pride and historical memory among young people.
4. Social cooperation – the process of fostering military patriotism requires cooperation between families, educational institutions, military organizations, and public institutions.
5. Principle of continuity – military-patriotic education is a continuous process that begins in preschool education and continues through higher education.

The process of developing military patriotism takes place under the influence of various social factors. The main ones include:

1. Family – an important social institution that forms love for the Motherland and respect for national values in an individual.
2. Education system – contributes to expanding young people's historical knowledge, developing civic consciousness, and forming military preparedness skills.
3. Cultural and educational activities – museums, historical monuments, and patriotic events enrich the spiritual world of young people.
4. Mass media – positively influences youth by promoting patriotic ideas.

Today, the political and social processes taking place in the world make the issue of ensuring national security even more urgent. Therefore, fostering the spirit of military patriotism among young people is considered one of the important directions of state policy. In modern society, military-patriotic education performs such tasks as developing civic consciousness among youth, fostering respect for national values, educating individuals ready to ensure state security, and increasing the social activity of young people.

In conclusion, the education of military patriotism is one of the important directions for the spiritual, moral, and civic development of the younger generation. It forms such qualities as love for the Motherland, national pride, awareness of civic duty, and readiness to protect state interests. The effectiveness of military-patriotic education depends on the cooperation of the family, the education system, social institutions, and cultural heritage. Therefore, it is necessary to organize the process of fostering patriotic spirit among youth in a comprehensive and continuous manner.
